taken to prevent any ill effects occurring therefrom. One improvement of some importance will necessarily result from reclaiming so much of the foreshore, namely the deepening of the water in the harbour, a matter of more importance than may be generally supposed, owing to the gradual silting up in parts. This is due to the dumping of rubbish which has gone on in the harbour for half a century. Millions of tons of ballast, building rubbish, and ashes from steamers have been deposited in it until now it is perceptibly shallower in the anchorage. So much is this the case that a great canal liner recently eluded up a lot of mud with her propeller. It is time therefore that some effective measures should be taken to prevent further deposits of this kind, and thus prevent the necessity arising for costly and continuous dredging operations in the near future. The chief offenders in this matter are the Chinese employed to take out to sea the building and other rubbish, and the Chinese and foreign steamers. Most of the dumping is now done at night under cover of the darkness. Now that the Reclamation is proceeding building rubbish can be of course, by permission of the authorities, be shot into the area being filled in, and there is no necessity to take it out to sea, but the boats cannot be employed to carry away the ashes and refuse from the steamers are supposed to carry it beyond the harbour limits, but by preference dump it quickly into the harbour and save themselves a journey. This is strictly forbidden by the Harbour Regulations, and severe penalties ought always to be inflicted when cases come before the Magistrates, but very few convictions, unfortunately, are secured, the offenders being generally befriended by the darkness. Some efforts should, however, be taken to detect the rubbish boats in these operations, or some regulation made to prevent them performing this work at night or except under supervision. The matter is one of grave importance, and would no doubt be promptly dealt with by a Harbour Conservancy Board if such a body existed in the Colony.
